INTRODUCTION

The House bill filing deadline has passed and almost 270 bills were filed on the last eligible day. In total, between the House and the Senate, over 3,400 bills have been filed this session and the House still has a few days to go before it reaches its deadline for appropriations bills. We do not expect many bills to be filed during this period as the House has already been working on their budget proposal and has released portions of the budget to the various subcommittees. We expect the House to approve the budget next week and then the budget goes to the Senate where it is expected to take about a month for the Senate to complete its budget negotiations. The two sides will then meet to discuss the differences in their budget proposals and those discussions typically go on behind closed doors and outside the view of lobbyists and the public.

The next looming deadline is the crossover deadline which will eliminate most bills from consideration. There will be a huge rush of activity between now and May 17th to try to move bills through either the House or the Senate to keep them eligible for the remainder of this year and possibly also next year. The crossover deadline does not apply to appropriations or finance bills.

The North Carolina State Board of Elections has announced that it will hold hearings regarding Representative Thomas Wright in the middle of May to determine whether to pursue criminal charges. Former Representative Michael Decker was sentenced to four years in federal court for his role in accepting a bribe for changing his political party affiliation to allow Speaker Black to remain in his position as speaker. It is clear that the new ethics rules developed as a result of these scandals requiring more disclosure by lobbyists, lobbyist PACs, and other political parties have changed the process and have made a difference in this session. There are fewer receptions and dinners for legislators and it appears that legislators are spending less time with lobbyists. We will continue to see how these changes affect the legislative process as the Ethics Commission makes rulings and considers gray areas in the law.
